School districts throughout the nation are faced with the challenge of how to ensure continuity of preK-12 education during the ongoing COVID-19 pandemic. Whether they are in districts that are implementing virtual, in-person or a combination of reopening models, school social workers are essential workers in school continuity. They provide valuable expertise in mental health and social care, as well as an understanding of racial and economic equity and the implications of these social determinants in student success. School social workers are especially crucial in addressing the impacts of COVID-19 on vulnerable students, including students of color, low-income students, English language learners, students with disabilities, immigrants and other special populations.
Key Considerations

Many school districts are including students, teachers, families, and other stakeholders in their decisions regarding how to resume operations this fall. There are many concerns being addressed such as:

- Ensuring infection prevention through a variety of measures (e.g. facilities, personal protective equipment, de-densifying approaches such as staggered schedules for in-person instruction, etc.)
- Addressing emotional trauma related to COVID-19 and deaths of students, staff, family members and others
- Repairing the impact of the disruption in learning and socialization due to school closures in spring 2020
- Addressing the social care needs of vulnerable students, including food security, mental health supports and adequate access to technology for online learning
- Addressing the learning and associated needs of students with disabilities for whom virtual or hybrid instruction may pose challenges

Below are ways that school social workers can play a role in supporting students and the larger school community this fall:

- Conduct a professional development training with school staff, including teachers, administrators and other professionals to help them understand and effectively respond to the mental health, social care and other challenges that may impact learning such as:

a) Disconnection and isolation from peers and staff

b) Grief over the COVID-19 related death of family members or loved ones

c) Unmet social care needs (e.g. adequate food, housing stability, access to technology, etc.) Family stress, which is associated with increased student maltreatment

d) Concerns about learning loss or learning disruption, particularly for students with disabilities

- Promote a caring and nurturing school community climate

a) Provide students with individual and/or group counseling as appropriate

b) Provide resources to staff, students and families

c) Facilitate team building activities. Examples are available at
